The new version of Elements adds new Smart Objects (also available in the new version of Photoshop Express), which contain a collection of templates and effects that can be applied to multiple photos concurrently. Lightroom 4 showed us how image collections could be organized for viewing and editing by multiple photographers, but with Lightroom 5, we're taking this feature to the next level. Imagine a group shot with a dozen or so images, all shot by different people. Instead of viewing them all separately or just viewing the collective, you can easily pick out the images shot by a particular person or group of people. I've trialed these features out, and they are powerful.

Despite the myriad of new features and improvements in Lightroom 5, it's still missing more in the way of features than it does in the way of improvements. In some ways, it feels like Lightroom 5 is an expansion of previous versions, with the same familiar layout and features that an image editor needs to do its job. If Lightroom remains as user-friendly as it is today, I have no doubt in my mind that it will win over a whole new set of customers.
